

TWO STRUCTURES OF GOD'S REDEMPTIVE MISSION

Purpose Statement: The goal of this category is to understand the roles of the two Biblical structures of the church in fulfilling the Great Commission.

Learning Objectives: This session will help you to:

1. Understand the role of the "church" in the fulfillment of the Great Commission.
2. Understand the role of the parachurch in the fulfillment of the Great Commission.

This article is based on a larger version written by Dr. Ralph Winter.

It is the thesis of this article that there will still be two basic kinds of structures that will make up the movement of Christianity. Most of the emphasis will be placed on pointing out the existence of these two structures as they have continuously appeared across the centuries. This will serve to define, illustrate and compare their nature and importance. Our efforts today in any part of the world will be the most effective only if both of these two structures are fully and properly involved.

Redemptive Structures in New Testament Times.

First of all let us recognize the structure so fondly called "the New Testament Church" as basically a Christian synagogue. Paul's missionary work consisted primarily of going to synagogues scattered across the Roman Empire, beginning in Asia Minor, and making clear to the Jewish and Gentile believers in those synagogues that the Messiah had come in Jesus Christ, the son of God; that in Christ a final authority even greater than Moses existed; and that this made possible the winning of the Gentiles without forcing upon them any literal cultural adaptation to the ritual provisions of the Mosaic Law. An outward novelty of Paul's work was the development eventually of wholly new synagogues, or meeting places, that were not only Christian, but also Greek.

Very few Christians, casually reading the New Testament and with only the New Testament available to them, would surmise the degree to which there had been Jewish evangelists who went before Paul all over the Empire, people whom Jesus himself described as "traversing land and sea to make a single proselyte." Paul followed their path; he built on their efforts and went beyond them with the new gospel he preached, which allowed the Greeks to remain Greeks and not be circumcised and culturally assimilated into the Jewish way of life.

Yet not only did Paul apparently go to every existing synagogue of Asia after which he declared, "...all Asia had heard the gospel," (Acts 19:10) but, when occasion demanded, he established brand new synagogue-type fellowships of believers as the basic unit of his missionary activity. The first structure in the New Testament scene is thus what is often called "the New Testament church." It was essentially built along Jewish synagogue lines, embracing the community of the faithful in any given place. The defining characteristic of this structure is that it included old and young, male and female. Note, too, that Paul was willing to build such fellowships out of former Jews as well as non-Jewish Greeks.

There is a second, quite different structure in the New Testament context. While we know very little about the structure of the evangelistic outreach within which pre-Pauline Jewish proselytizers worked, we do know, as already mentioned, that they operated all over the Roman Empire. It would be surprising if Paul didn't follow somewhat the same procedures. And we know a great deal more about the way Paul operated. He was, true enough, sent out by the church in Antioch. But once away from Antioch he seemed very much on his own. The little team he formed was economically self-sufficient when occasion demanded. It was also dependent, from time to time, not alone upon the Antioch church, but upon other churches that had risen as a result of evangelistic labors. Paul's team may certainly be considered to have a structure. While its design and form is not made concrete for us on the basis of remaining documents, neither, of course, is the New Testament church so defined concretely for us in the pages of the New Testament. In both cases, the absence of any such definition implies the pre-existence of a commonly understood pattern of relationship, whether in the case of the church or the missionary band that Paul formed.

Thus, on the one hand, the structure we call "the New Testament church" is a prototype of all subsequent Christian fellowships where old and young, male and female are gathered together as normal biological families in aggregate. On the other hand, Paul's "missionary band" can be considered a prototype of all subsequent missionary endeavors organized out of committed, experienced workers who affiliated themselves as a second decision beyond membership in the first structure.

Note well the additional commitment. Note also that the structure that resulted was something definitely more than the extended outreach of the Antioch church. No matter what we think the structure was, we know that it was not simply the Antioch church operating at a distance from its home base. It was something else, something different. We will consider the missionary band the second of the two redemptive structures in New Testament times.

In conclusion, it is very important to note that neither of these structures was, as it were, "let down from heaven" in a special way. It may be shocking at first to think that God made use of either a Jewish synagogue pattern or a Jewish evangelistic pattern. But this must not be more surprising than the fact that God employed the use of the pagan Greek language, the Holy Spirit guiding the biblical writers to lay hold of such terms as "Kurios" (originally a pagan term), and pound them into shape to carry the Christian revelation. The New Testament refers to a synagogue dedicated to Satan, but this did not mean that Christians, to avoid such a pattern, could not fellowship together in the synagogue pattern. These considerations prepare us for what comes next in the history of the expansion of the gospel, because we see other patterns chosen by Christians at a later date whose origins are just as clearly "borrowed patterns" as were those in the New Testament period.

In fact, the profound missiological implication of all this is that the New Testament is trying to show us how to borrow effective patterns; it is trying to free all future missionaries from the need to follow the precise two forms of the Jewish synagogue (which grew out of the Temple worship and priesthood) and Jewish missionary band (which grew out of the prophetic ministry), and yet to allow them to choose comparable indigenous structures in the countless new situations across history and around the world--structures which will correspond faithfully to the function of patterns Paul employed, if not their form. It is no wonder that a considerable body of literature in the field of missiology today underlies the fact that world Christianity has generally employed the various existing languages and cultures of the world-human community--more so than any other religion--and in so doing, has cast into a shadow all efforts to canonize as universal any kind of mechanically formal extension of the New Testament church. As Kraft has said earlier, we seek "dynamic equivalence," not formal replication.

The Early Development of Christian Structures Within Roman Culture.

Of course, the original synagogue pattern persisted as a Christian structure for some time. Rivalry between Christians and Jews, however, tended to defeat this as a Christian pattern, and in some cases to force it out of existence, especially where it was possible for Jewish congregations of the dispersion to arouse public persecution of the apparently deviant Christian synagogues. Unlike the Jews, Christians had no official license for their alternative to the Roman Imperial cult. Thus, whereas each synagogue was assimilated to the Roman context, the bishops became invested with authority (after AD 318) over more than one congregation with a territorial jurisdiction not altogether different from the pattern of Roman civil government. This tendency is well confirmed by the time that official recognition of Christianity had its full impact: the very Latin word for Roman magisterial territories was appropriated--the diocese--within which parishes are to be found on the local level.

In any case, while the more "congregational" pattern of the independent synagogue became pervasively replaced by a "connectional" Roman pattern, the new Christian "parish church" still preserved the basic constituency of the synagogue, namely, the combination of old and young, male and female--that is, a biologically perpetuating organism.

Meanwhile, the monastic tradition in various early forms (after AD 250), developed as a second structure. This new, widely proliferating structure undoubtedly had no connection at all with the missionary band in which Paul was involved. Indeed, it more substantially drew from Roman military structure than from any other single course. Pachomius, a former military man, gained three thousand followers and attracted the attention of people like Basil of Caesarea, and then through Basil, John Cassian, who labored in southern Gaul (France) at a later date. These men thus carried forward a disciplined structure, borrowed primarily from the military, which allowed nominal Christians to make a second-level choice--an additional specific commitment.

We often hear that the monks "fled the world." Compare that idea with this description by a Baptist missionary scholar:

The Benedictine rule and the many derived from it probably helped to give dignity to labor, including manual labor in the fields. This was in striking contrast with the aristocratic conviction of the servile status of manual work which was also the attitude of the warriors and non-monastic ecclesiastics who constituted the upper middle classes of the Middle Ages...To the monasteries...was obviously due much clearing of land and improvement in methods of agriculture. In the midst of barbarism, the monasteries were centers of orderly and settled life and monks were assigned the duty of road-building and road repair. Until the rise of the towns in the eleventh century, they were pioneers in industry and commerce. The shops of the monasteries preserved the industries of Roman times...The earliest use of marl in improving the soil is attributed to them. The great French monastic orders led in the agricultural colonization of Western Europe. Especially did the Cistercians make their houses centers of agriculture and contribute to improvements in that occupation. With their lay brothers and their hired laborers, they became great landed proprietors. In Hungary and on the German frontier the Cistercians were particularly important in reducing the soil to cultivation and in furthering colonization. In Poland, too, the German monasteries set advanced standards in agriculture and introduced artisans and craftsmen.

In a similar way for mission leaders the pattern of activity was decisively reinforced by the magnificent record of the Irish "peregrini," who were Celtic monks who did more to reach out to convert Anglo-Saxons than did Augustine's mission, and who contributed more to the evangelization of Western Europe, even Central Europe, than any other force. From its very inception this mission structure was highly significant to the growth and development of the Christian movement. In the Middle East and Asia the Church of the East spread missions to India, China and eventually Russia.

We must now follow these threads into the next period, where we will see the formal emergence of the major monastic structures. It is sufficient at this point merely to note that there are already by the fourth century two very different kinds of structures--the diocese and the monastery--both of them significant in the transmission and expansion of Christianity. They are each patterns borrowed from the cultural context of their time, just as were the earlier Christian synagogue and missionary band.

It is even more important for our purpose here to note that while these two structures are formally different from--and historically unrelated to--the two in New Testament times, they are nevertheless functionally the same. In order to speak conveniently about the continuing similarities in function, let us now call the synagogue and diocese forms modalities, and the missionary band and monastery sodalities. A modality is a structured fellowship in which there is no distinction of sex or age, while a sodality is a structural fellowship in which membership involves an adult's second decision beyond modality membership and is limited by either age or sex or marital status. In this use of these terms, both the denomination and the local congregation are modalities, while a mission agency or a local men's ministry are sodalities.

In this early post-biblical period there was little relation between modality and sodality, while in Paul's time his missionary band specifically nourished the churches--a most significant symbiosis. We shall now see how the medieval period essentially recovered the healthy New Testament relationship between modality and sodality.

The Medieval Synthesis of Modality and Sodality.

We can say that the Medieval period began when the Roman Empire in the West started to break down. To some extent the diocesan pattern, following as it did the Roman civil-governmental pattern, tended to break down at the same time. The monastic (or sodality) pattern turned out to be much more durable, and as a result gained greater importance in the early medieval period than it might have otherwise. The survival of the modality (diocesan Christianity) was further compromised by the fact that some of the invaders of this early medieval period generally belonged to a different brand of Christian belief--they were from the Church of the East. As a result, in many places there were both "Eastern" and "Roman Catholic" Christian churches on opposite corners of a main street--something like today, where we have Methodist and Presbyterian churches across the street from each other.

Perhaps the most outstanding illustration in the early medieval period of the importance of the relationship between modality and sodality is the collaboration between Gregory the Great and a man later called Augustine of Canterbury. While Gregory, as the bishop of the diocese of Rome, was the head of a modality, both he and Augustine were the products of monastic houses--a fact which reflects the dominance even then of the sodality pattern of Christian structure. Gregory called upon his friend Augustine to undertake a major mission to England in order to try to plant diocesan structure there, where Celtic Christianity had been deeply wounded by the invasion of Saxon warriors from the continent.

As strong as Gregory was in his own diocese, he simply had no structure to call upon to reach out in this intended mission other than a sodality, which at this point was a Benedictine monastery. This is why he ended up asking Augustine and a group of other members of the same monastery to undertake this rather dangerous journey and important mission on his behalf. The purpose of the mission, curiously, was not to extend the Benedictine form of monasticism. The remnant of the Celtic "church" in England was itself a network of sodalities since there were no parish systems in the Celtic area. Augustine went to England to establish diocesan Christianity, though he himself was not a diocesan priest.

During a lengthy period of time in Europe, perhaps a thousand years, the building and rebuilding of the modalities (churches) was mainly the work of the sodalities. That is to say the monasteries, and their mission efforts, were uniformly the source and the real focus point of new energy and vitality that flowed into the diocesan side of the Christian movement. We think of the momentous Cluny reform, then the Cistercians, then the Friars, and finally the Jesuits--all of them strictly sodalities, but sodalities which contributed massively to the building and the rebuilding of the Corpus Cristianum, the network of dioceses, which Protestants often identify as "the" Christian movement.

At many points there was rivalry between these two structures, between bishop and abbot, diocese and monastery, modality and sodality, but the great achievement of the medieval period is the ultimate synthesis, delicately achieved, whereby Catholic orders were able to function along with Catholic parishes and dioceses without the two structures conflicting with each other to the point of a setback to the movement. The harmony between the modality and the sodality achieved by the Roman church is perhaps the most significant characteristic of this phase of the world Christian movement and continues to be Rome's greatest organizational advantage to this day.

Note, however, that is not our intention to claim that any one organization of either the modality or sodality variety was continuously the champion of vitality and vigor throughout the thousands of years of the medieval epoch. As a matter of actual fact, there really is no very impressive organizational continuity in the Christian movement, either in the form of modality or sodality.

On the other hand, it is clear that the sodality, as it was recreated again and again by different leaders, was almost always the prime mover, the source of inspiration and renewal that overflowed into the papacy and created the reform movements that blessed diocesan Christianity from time to time. The most significant instance of this is the accession to the papal throne of Hildebrand (Gregory VII), who brought the ideals, commitment and discipline of the monastic movement right into the Vatican itself. In this sense are not the papacy, the College of Cardinals, the diocese, and the parish structure of the Roman church in some respects a secondary element, a derivation from the monastic tradition rather than vice versa? They grew as much from Charlemagne's civil organization (Feudalism) as from church practice. In any case, it seems appropriate that the priests of the monastic/mission tradition are called "regular priests," while the priests of the diocese/parish are called "secular priests." The former are voluntarily bound by a "regula," while the latter as a group were other than, outside of ("cut off") or somehow less than the second-decision communities bound by regula. Whenever a house or project or parish run by the regular clergy is brought under the domination of the secular clergy, this is a form of the "secularization" of that entity. In the lengthy "Investiture Controversy," the regular clergy finally gained clear authority for at least semi-autonomous operation, and the secularization of the orders was averted.

We cannot leave the medieval period without referring to the many unofficial and often persecuted movements that also mark the era. In all of this, the Bible itself is perhaps the ultimate prime mover, as we see in the case of Peter Waldo. His work stands as a powerful demonstration of the simple power of a vernacular translation of the Bible where the people were unable to appreciate either Jerome's classical translation or the celebration of the Mass in Latin. A large number of groups referred to as "Anabaptists" are to be found in many parts of Europe. One of the chief characteristics of these renewal movements is that they did not attempt to elicit merely celibate participation, although this was one of their traits on occasion, but often simply developed whole "new communities" of believers and their families attempting by biological and cultural transmission to preserve a high and enlightened form of Christianity. These groups usually faced such strong opposition and grave limitations that it would be very unfair to judge their virility by their progress. It is important to note, however, that the average Mennonite or Salvation Army community, where whole families are members, typified the desire for a "pure" church, or what is often called a "believers" church, and constitutes a most significant experiment in Christian structure. Such a structure stands, in a certain sense, midway between a modality and a sodality, since it has the constituency of the modality (involving full families) and yet, in its earliest years, may have the vitality and selectivity of a sodality.

We have space here only to point out that in terms of the durability and quality of the Christian faith, the 1000-year medieval period is virtually impossible to account for apart from the role of the sodalities. What happened in Rome is merely the tip of the iceberg at best, and represents a rather superficial and political level. It is quite a contrast to the foundational well-springs of biblical study and radical obedience represented by the various sodalities of this momentous millennium.

The Protestant Recovery of the Sodality.

The Protestant movement started out by attempting to do without any kind of sodality structure. Martin Luther had been discontent with the apparent polarization between the vitality he eventually discovered in his own order and the very nominal parish life of his time. Being dissatisfied with this cleavage, he abandoned the sodality in which he finally found faith and took advantage of the political forces of his time to launch a full-scale renewal movement on the general level of church life. At first, he even tried to do without the characteristically Roman diocesan tradition. The Lutheran movement did not in a comparable sense readopt the sodalities, the Catholic orders, that had been so prominent in the Roman tradition.

This omission, in my evaluation, represents the greatest error of the Reformation and the greatest weakness of the resulting Protestant tradition. Had it not been for the so-called Pietist movement in Germany and the Brethren missions movement, the Protestants would have been totally devoid of any organized renewing structures within their tradition.

The Pietist tradition, in every new emergence of its force, was very definitely a sodality, in as much as it was a case of adults meeting together and committing themselves to new beginnings and higher goals as Christians without conflicting with the stated meetings of the existing church. This phenomenon of sodality nourishing modality is prominent in the case of the early work of John Wesley. He absolutely prohibited any abandonment of the Parish churches. A contemporary example is the widely influential so-called East African Revival, which has now involved a million people but has very carefully avoided any clash with functioning of local churches. The churches that have not fought against this movement have been greatly blessed by it.

However, the Pietist movement, along with the Anabaptist new communities, eventually dropped back to the level of the biological growth; it reverted to the ordinary pattern of congregational life. It reverted from the level of the sodality to the level of the modality, and in most cases, rather soon became ineffective either as a mission structure or as a renewing force.

What interests us most is the fact that in failing to exploit the power of the sodality, the Protestants had no mechanism for missions for almost three hundred years, until William Carey proposed "the use of means for the conversion of the heathen." His key word, "means" refers specifically to the need for a sodality, for the organized but non-ecclesiastical initiative of the warm-hearted. Thus the resulting Baptist Missionary Society is one of the most significant organizational developments in the Protestant tradition. It set off a rush to the use of this kind of "means" for the conversion of the heathen, and we find in the next few years a number of societies forming along similar lines: the LMS and NMS in 1795, the CMS in 1799, the CFBS in 1804, the BCFM in 1810, and ABMB in 1814, the CMS in 1815, the DMS in 1821, the FEM in 1822 and the BM in 1824--twelve societies in thirty-two years. Once this method of operation was clearly understood by the Protestants, three hundred years of latent energies burst forth in what became, in L'atourette's phrase, "The Great Century."

The Nineteenth Century is thus the first century in which Protestants were actively engaged in missions. For reasons that we have not space here to explain, it was also the century of the lowest ebb of Catholic mission energy. Amazingly, in this one century, Protestants, building on the unprecedented world expansion of the West, caught up with eighteen centuries of earlier mission efforts by the Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Church of the East. There is simply no question that what was done in this century moved the Protestant stream for a self-contained, impotent European backwater into a world force in Christianity. Looking back from where we stand today, of course, it is hard to believe how recently the Protestant movement has become prominent.

Organizationally speaking, the vehicle that allowed the Protestant movement to become vital was the structural development of the sodality that harvested the vital "voluntarism" latent in Protestantism, and surfaced in new mission agencies of all kinds, both at home and overseas. Wave after wave of evangelical initiatives transformed the entire map of Christianity, especially in the United States, but also in England, and to a lesser degree in Scandinavia and on the continent. By 1840, the phenomenon of mission sodalities was so prominent in the United States that the phrase "the Evangelical Empire" and other equivalent phrases were used to refer to it, and now began a trickle of ecclesiastical opposition to this bright new emergence of the second structure.

The Contemporary Misunderstanding of the Mission Sodality.

Almost all mission efforts in the Nineteenth Century, whether sponsored by interdenominational boards or denominational boards, were substantially the work of initiatives that were mainly independent of the ecclesiastical structures to which they were related. Toward the later half of the Nineteenth Century, there seemed increasingly to be two separate structural traditions.

There were men like Henry Venn and Rufus Anderson, who were the strategic thinkers at the helm of older societies--the Church Missionary Society (CMS) in England and American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM), respectively. These men championed the semi-autonomous mission sodality, and they voiced an attitude that was not at first contradicted by any significant part of the leaders of the ecclesiastical structures. On the other hand, there was the centralizing perspective of denominational leaders which gained ground almost without any reversal throughout the latter two-thirds of the Nineteenth Century, so that by the early part of the Twentieth Century, there was a new burst of totally separate mission sodalities called the Faith Missions, with Hudson Taylor's CIM taking the lead. It is not widely recognized that this pattern was mainly a recrudescence of the pattern that had been established earlier in the century, prior to the trend toward denominational boards.

All of these changes took place very gradually. Attitudes at any point are hard to pin down, but it does seem clear that Protestants were always a bit unsure about the legitimacy of the second structure, the sodality. The Anabaptist tradition consistently emphasized the concept of a pure community of believers and thus was uninterested in a voluntarism that would involve only part of the believing community. U.S. denominations for their part, lacking tax support as on the Continent, were generally a more selective and vital fellowship than the European state churches, and at least in their youthful exuberance, felt quite capable as denominations of providing all of the necessary initiative for overseas mission. It is for this latter reason that the many new denominations of the U.S. have tended to act as though centralized church control of mission efforts is the only proper pattern.

As a result, by the Second World War, a very nearly complete transmutation had taken place in the case of almost all mission efforts related to denominational structures. That is, almost all older denominational boards, though once semi-autonomous or very nearly independent, had by this time become part of unified budget provisions and so forth. At the same time, and partially as a result, a whole new host of independent mission structures burst forth again, especially after the Second World War. As in the case of the earlier emergence of the Faith Missions, these tended to pay little attention to denominational leaders and their aspirations for church-centered mission. The Anglican Church with its CMS, USPG, etc., displays the medieval synthesis, and so, almost unconsciously, does the American Conservative Baptist Association with its associated CBFMS, CBHMS structures. Thus, to this day, among Protestants, there continues to be deep confusion about the legitimacy and proper relationship of the two structures that have manifested themselves throughout the history of the Christian movement.

To make matters worse, Protestant blindness about the need for mission sodalities has had a very tragic influence on mission fields. Protestant missions, being modality-minded, have tended to assume that merely modalities, e.g., churches, need to be established. Even in the case where mission work is being pursued by what are essentially semi-autonomous mission sodalities, it is modalities, not sodalities, which are the only goal. That is to say, the mission agencies (even those that have been most independent themselves from denominations back home) have tended in their mission work very simply to set up churches and not to plant, in addition, mission sodalities in the so-called mission lands.

As we look back on it today, it is surprising that most Protestant missionaries, working with (mission) structures that did not exist in the Protestant tradition for hundreds of years and without whose existence there would have been no mission initiative, have nevertheless been blind to the significance of the very structure within which they have worked. In this blindness they have merely planted churches and have not effectively concerned themselves to make sure that the kind of mission structure within which they operate also be set up on the fields. As a matter of fact, many of the mission agencies founded after World War II, out of the extreme deference to existing church movements already established in foreign lands, have not even tried to set up churches, and have worked for many years merely as auxiliary agencies in various service capacities trying to help the churches that were already there...

The question we must ask is how long it will be before the younger churches of the so-called mission territories of the non-Western world come to that epochal conclusion (to which the Protestant movement in Europe only tardily came), namely, that there needs to be sodality structures, such as William Carey's "use of means," in order for church people to reach out in vital initiatives in mission, especially cross-cultural mission. There are already some hopeful signs that this tragic delay will not continue. We see, for example, the outstanding work of the Melanesian Brotherhood in the Solomon Islands. On a worldwide basis Campus Crusade for Christ and the Navigators accomplish sodality mission with outstanding spiritual fruit.

Conclusion.

This article has been in no sense an attempt to decry or to criticize the organized church. It has assumed both the necessity and the importance of the parish structure, the diocesan structure, the denominational structure, and the ecclesiastical structure. The modality structure in the view of this article is a significant and absolutely essential structure. All that is attempted here is to explore some of the historical patterns, which make clear that God, through His Holy Spirit, has clearly and consistently used another structure other than (and sometimes instead of) the modality structure. It is our attempt here to help the church and mission leaders to understand the legitimacy of both structures, and the necessity for both structures not only to exist but to work together harmoniously for the fulfillment of the Great Commission, and for the fulfillment of all that God desires for our time.

Discussion: Write out answers to these questions. Be prepared to discuss your answers in class.

1. What is "modality?" Give a clear example found locally. What examples are given in the article?

Note to instructor: "modality" is the church. Examples are the New Testament church at Ephesus, First Baptist Church of Orlando, etc.

2. What is "sodality?" Give a clear example found locally. What examples are given in the article?

Note to instructor: "sodality" is the smaller, mission-minded group. They are usually more active in missions. It is possible to have a sodality within a modality (the Outreach Committee of a local church). Examples could be the monasteries, missionary band of the Apostle Paul, etc.

3. What has been the role played by sodalities in church history?

Note to instructor: missions/outreach.

4. Which of these terms best describe Campus Crusade for Christ? Why?

Note to instructor: Sodality.

5. Which is more important: the church or the para-church? Why? What role should each fulfill and how can they complement each other?

Note to instructor: Both are important. God uses both. They should both adopt each other. The church is the sponsor and the institutional arm; the sodality builds the modality. The modality needs to send out into the sodality; the sodality needs to work with the modality.

6. Should our tithe all go to the local church or can some go to the church and some directly to missions?

Note to instructor: If God wants both, support both as God leads.
